Excerpt: .the Admiral, but a change in his nature is perceived. The beginnings of an incestuous love for his daughter Theocrine become apparent; at her wedding banquet he madly toasts her, breaks off the betrothal to Beaufort, and retires with Theocrine to his own house. At last he imparts his mad passion to his feigned friend Montreville, a rejected suitor of Theocrine, who advises him to overcome his unruly desires by putting temptation away from him. The father, battling with himself, seizing any help, entrusts his daughter to Montreville, by whom she is carried off to his fortress. Here he holds her despite the efforts of both her lover and her father. For Malefort has over-estimated his own power of self control;--tormented, racked, allowing himself to be convinced by false analogies and sophistry, he comes to Montreville to beseech him to restore his daughter. If the...
