CHAPTER IX THE END (1844-1855) I was transfixed to my Poland with body and with soul. All her feelings I took unto myself, except despair. I poured her tears, her blood, into the chalice of my heart. I gathered to my bosom her every cry of pain, and bound it to the strained string of my soul. I am dust, but with a heart in which the mourning of the nation sobs, with a lyre upon my breast through which millions weep. Severyn Goszczynski. The last eleven years of Adam Mickiewicz's mortal pilgrimage are little more than a chronicle of a soul struggling in the toils. They are marked by few, if any, outward events, save those two attempts to found a Polish legion in Italy and in Turkey respectively, both of which were doomed to the failure that dogged all Mickiewicz...
