Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: .Come, the times are dry, and may this be my poison, if ever I spend two more pious, stupid months in all my life! Well, after travelling some days, whom should I light upon but a company of strolling players. The moment I saw them at a distance my heart warmed to them; I had a sort of natural love for everything of the vagabond order. They were employed in settling their baggage, which had been overturned in a narrow way: I offered my assistance, which they accepted, and we soon became so well acquainted that they took me as a servant. This was a paradise to me; they sang, danced, drank, ate, and travelled all at the same time. By the blood of all the Mirabels! I thought I had never lived till then; I grew as merry as a grig, and laughed at every word that was spoken. They liked me as much as I liked them. I was a very good figure, as you may see; and though I was poor, I was not modest. I love a straggling life above all things in the world; sometimes good, sometimes bad; to be warm one day, and cold to-morrow; to eat when we can get it, and drink when--the tankard is out--it stands before me. We arrived that evening at Tenterden, and took a large room at the Greyhound, where we resolved to exhibit Romeo and Juliet, with the funeral procession, the grave, and...
