The decline then anticipates the sowing in all its branches. By the middle of March the need begins to pall, and, Professor Sumner, writing in 1876 of the currency between 1850-60, says: The same course of events, more or less marked, occurred throughout this period. Currency flowed to New York during the summer, was loaned on call (interest being paid for deposits), was withdrawn in the fall, producing contraction of loans and stringency. History of American Currency, pp. 176-7.) gradually, as loans are paid and commodities bought, the money flows back to New York. The crops are growing over the land. The farmer has bought his supplies. The spring and summer clothes have been procured. It is the early summer and mid-summer inactivity. Business is dull. There is one break in this slackening need for exchange, and this occurs in the weeks ending July 1st and 8th. Two big events occur in these weeks. The mid-year settling date is followed within three days by Fourth of July. The heavy payments in dividends have a temporary effect. Wages are often prepaid over the holiday. Families go off for the day and pocket money is needed. Thus the holiday expenditure is reflected in the second retreating dot. So the pleasures as well as the labors of a people may be read from the statistical records of the past. The next two weeks in July show the maximum summer funds. By the last week of...
